Founded in 1884 as WILMINA
Osaka, Japan

Wilmina/Osaka Jogakuin University and 137 years

Rev. A.D. Hail, a Presbyterian Missionary, who was later joined by his brother, Rev. J.B. Hail, founded Wilmina Girls’ School in 1884 (which later become Osaka Jogakuin). When J.B.Hail came to Japan, he wrote “All conception of personal being as an independent unit was foreign to any philosophy they had ever been taught. ... The idea of man as a unit, or that he is personally responsible for his actions, was something they did not understand” because in Japan in those day, it was difficult to understand the idea of a personal GOD, or of a personal man, in relation to a personal God. For 137 years, Osaka Jogakuin has been continuing our efforts to foster the growth and respect of an independent personality.

Rev. J.B. Hail & Rev. A.D. Hail

When joining in the global pursuit of solutions to the complex problems we face, it is vital to retain individual character, treat others with respect and address issues based on shared viewpoints and perceptions. With the awareness of an existence beyond the human level, each student has the capacity to feel other’s problems as if they were one’s own, respect the identities of others, and stand as a responsible self, regardless of where or when in their future.

Wilmina Girls’ School at the Kawaguchi Foreign Settlement in Osaka

Osaka Jogakuin’s commitment to personal development and respect of individuals as a core education value allows us to support students’ study and research in our graduate school, and as they go out into the world.

Mission Statement

This school is an educational community based on Christianity.
 Our aim is to educate people who search for truth,
 respect themselves and others,
 have the power of insight supported by accurate knowledge and rich sensitivity, and participate actively in society.

Diploma Policy

Based on our mission statement and curriculum policy, a degree is awarded by Osaka Jogakuin University Graduate School of International Collaboration and Coexistence in the 21st Century Course of Peace Studies and Human Rights Studies. Our curriculum is built on the fundamental policy of “schools which are designed to teach academic theories and application of this knowledge, cultivate knowledge and in-depth ability to engage in professions which require advanced expertise, and contribute to the development of society (Article 99 paragraph 1 of the School Education Act)”.

To complete the master’s course, a student needs to take courses to acquire prescribed credits, receive necessary research guidance, receive an approval of the master’s thesis, carry out the research and write the thesis, and pass a final defense of the thesis.

To complete the doctorate course, a student needs to receive necessary research guidance, receive an approval of the doctoral thesis, carry out the research, write the dissertation, and pass a final defense.

Students who complete the master’s course will be conferred the degree of Master of Peace and Human Rights Studies. This demonstrates that they have gained the necessary attitudes to be involved with complex issues in the world and have acquired in-depth knowledge with a broad viewpoint, developed an ability to research in the fields of “Peace/Coexistence” or “Human Rights/Development”, and developed the abilities for highly specialized professional roles. Students who complete the doctorate course will be conferred the degree of Doctor of Peace and Human Rights Studies. This demonstrates that they have gained attitudes to be involved with complex issues in the world, acquired an ability to conduct independent research into “Peace /Coexistence” or “Human Rights/Development” as a researcher, and gained rich academic knowledge with highly skilled research ability required for specialized roles in the world.

Curriculum Policy

The world needs new paradigms for international and social relations to approach universal challenges regarding peace and human rights. Our programs cultivate research abilities in the students that integrate both fundamental and specialized approaches to those challenges for the world, identify structure for resolutions, and promote an ability to engage in highly specialized professional roles.

The content of this course is focused on international relations with perspectives from security, international human rights policy research, law (political science), and sociology.

The master’s course aims to cultivate in the students the ability to research in the fields and develop an outstanding ability to carry out specialized professional roles in the world.

The doctorate course aims to foster persons who have the abilities to conduct independent research and who have gained practical research abilities to carry out highly specialized roles in society.

Considering the characteristics of the research area and international compatibility, we design courses from an interdisciplinary and comprehensive perspective. Through the English medium of instruction curriculum and through writing the thesis, students acquire rich content knowledge and expertise.

English is used as the language of instruction as we foster international specialist who will not only work in Japan but also in other countries. Furthermore, they may work in international organizations in Asia or around the world.

Admission Policy

We seek women with ambitions to work with people around the world. These women will face the challenges related to peace and human rights such as the world problem of simultaneous gluttony and starvation, and the increase of environmental destruction and pollution.

Moreover, our hope is to foster specialists to work in human rights administration within the developing nations, particularly Asia. In addition, we hope to educate women to engage in research, administration and activism aimed at promoting human rights and peace. We would like to actively recruit international students from Asia and developing nations to this English as a medium of instruction course.

Peace and Coexistence Studies

Students examine and research peace and coexistence studies from various aspects in international societies. Alongside national and international security priorities, demand has grown recently for the establishment and strengthening of frameworks for human security. We are now compelled to understand peace not simply as the absence of armed conflict, but as a state in which human dignity is upheld, fairness preserved, and basic human needs satisfied. The world has also become dramatically more global and more multicultural regardless of our desires. In this context, we are urgently required to provide policies and education which should accomplish coexistence among people from various backgrounds.

An overview of these issues is provided in subjects including "Theory of International Relations" and "Contemporary Multicultural Societies", while specifics are addressed in subjects such as "Theory of Peace and Security", "Japanese Culture", "Research on Conflict Transformation by Peaceful Means", and "Research on Facilitation and Mediation". Through studying the other related subjects in the course, students are given a great opportunity to deepen their understanding and research skills in the field of peace and coexistence study.

Human Rights and Development Studies

In this course, students develop a better understanding of multilayered problems regarding human rights and development and carry out research. Under ever-changing political economic and social conditions, such as increasing globalization, growing economic disparity, and escalating conflicts, new issues of human rights and developments emerge one after another. There is a strong need for people who study theoretical, policy-making, and practical approaches to these issues. Also, since a human rights-based approach to development has been drawing attention in recent years, a comprehensive study in the fields of both human rights and development is important.

An overview of these issues is provided in subjects including "Policy of International Cooperation in Education" and "Theory of International Human Rights" while specifics are addressed in subjects such as "Gender Theory", "Minority Rights", "Theory of Civil Politics", and "Research on Development Education". Through studying the other related subjects in the course, students have the opportunity to research extensively on human rights and development, moving between theory and practice.

Practice-oriented curriculum attuned to the needs of international organizations and NGOs operating across borders

There are many commonalities between study and research in the dual fields of "peace" and "human rights systems" and the operational aims of international organizations, NGOs, and other transnational bodies. Curriculum design has been informed by a primary concern to cultivate students' capacities to work in and contribute to organs of the United Nations and related entities.

English-language medium for all programs and classes

Advanced and comprehensive proficiency in the English language is vital for anyone seeking either to undertake duties in organs of the UN or associated bodies, or to engage actively in academic research on related issues. This is the reason that English is used as the language of instruction throughout the courses, including the writing of the Master's and Doctoral theses. In developing countries and regions, for example, there is high demand for specialist personnel to implement schemes that promote genuine action in the following fields of social development:

- Safeguarding of human rights within corporate enterprises and the labor force
- Safeguarding and protecting the human rights of children and women
- Promoting education for national democratization and self-reliance among ethnic groups
- Developing and safeguarding medical care systems
- Implementing activities towards conciliation of disputes and the maintenance of peace
- Developing agreements on environmental protection

In addition to cultivating personnel within Japan, we will actively recruit international students from Asia to this course instructed in English. Our hope is to foster specialists for human rights administration within the developing nations of Asia in particular, and to educate personnel to engage in research, administration, and activism aimed at fostering a regard for human rights and peace. This should view systems of international relations and global order as not exclusive.

Emphasis on overseas internships and fieldwork

In both the Master's and Doctoral programs, participation in either an internship or fieldwork project overseas* is a prerequisite for thesis submission. Internships may involve, for example, work at an NGO engaged in social development activities in a developing nation. By collaborating with staff at the frontline of these activities, interns come to appreciate the actual efforts made by such organizations to address problems and challenges on the ground, and develop clearer conceptions of their own positions on key issues. They can also expect to develop comprehensive management abilities integrating skills including communication, teamwork, and leadership that will be required of them in future employment in international organizations. Fieldwork overseas enables students to explore problems closely related to their own research topics through direct engagement at the actual field sites in question and with the cooperation of local organizations. This is sure to yield deeper insights into specific research themes and extend individual outlooks.

*Internship or fieldwork project can be carried out in Japan in case the advisor approves.

Syllabus

Program for developing international organization staff

This program aims at providing students with the skills and specialized knowledge necessary to pursue a successful career with international organisations, including both intergovernmental organisations such as the United Nations and international non-governmental organisations (NGOs). It will also be useful for students interested in diplomacy or international business.

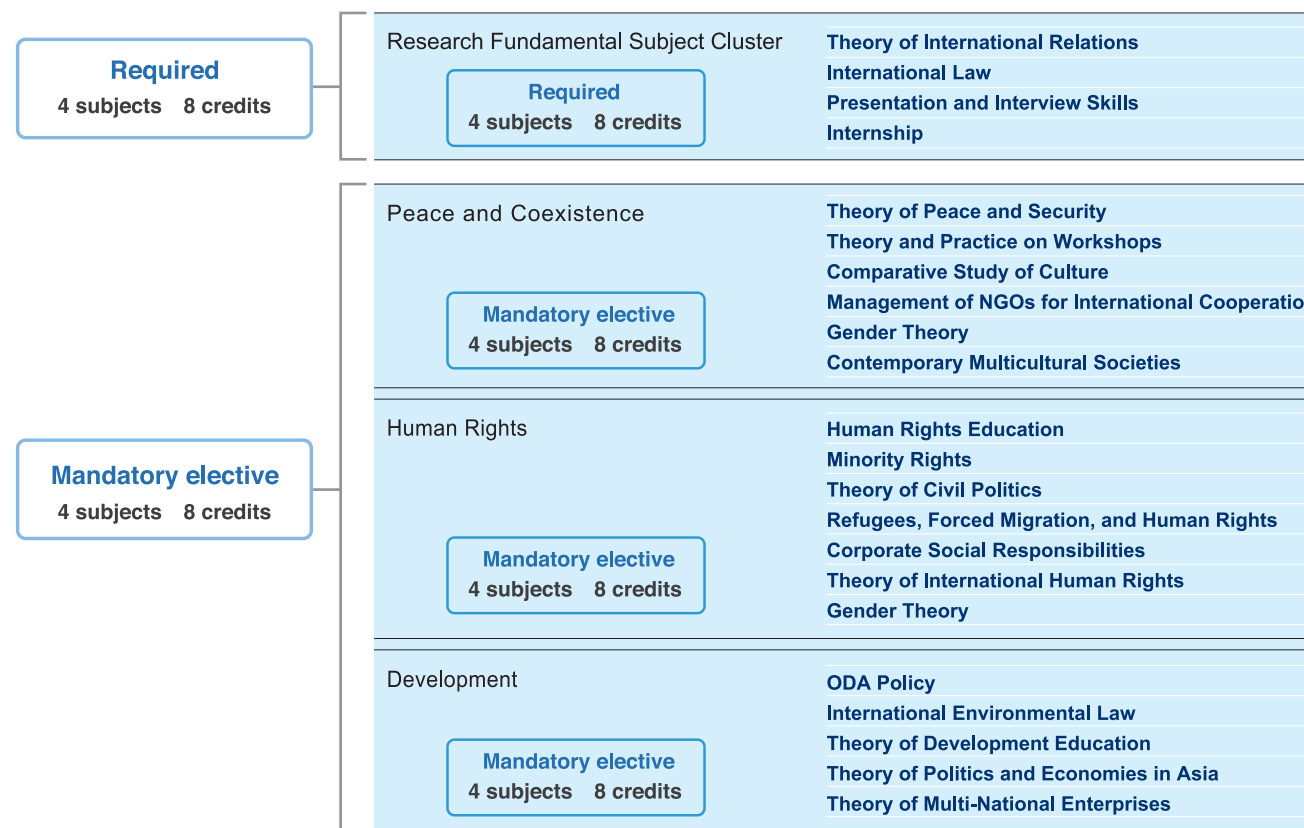

In today's increasingly globalized world, it is rare that a problem can be solved through the efforts of one country alone. The environmental crisis, mass human rights violations and refugee flows, human trafficking and forced labour, the spread of nuclear weapons, transnational organised crime – all of these issues have international implications and can only be addressed effectively through intense and effective international co-operation.

International organisations such as the United Nations and its specialized agencies, the World Bank, and the International Atomic Energy Agency play indispensable roles in co-ordinating and managing that co-operation. They provide spaces for governments to discuss measures in peace and security, decide international legal treaties and resolutions, co-ordinate humanitarian aid, assist countries and communities in economic and social development, and monitor human rights and other standards. Civil society is also a vital player. Often referred to as the conscience of the international community, NGOs provide a voice for citizens worldwide, making sure that humanitarian and development assistance goes to the most vulnerable persons. Furthermore, report on human rights violations, and hold governments, international organisations, and multinational corporations accountable. Prominent international NGOs include Amnesty International, Oxfam, Save the Children, and Medecins Sans Frontieres.

Students enrolled in this program will be required to complete courses in International Law and International Relations, two areas that constitute the foundation of any international career. Students will also take International Presentations, where they will receive focused training on the selection process of international organisations. This will include the preparation of application materials and the conducting of mock, 'competency based' interviews – skills that are important not only in international organisations, but in any international setting. Students are also strongly encouraged to undergo an internship in a relevant organization, either in Japan or abroad, to obtain practical experience.

In addition, students will be required to complete at least two subjects from any of the three multi-disciplinary clusters: Peace and Coexistence; Human Rights; or Development. This concentration will ensure that students have the specialized knowledge necessary to build an international career.

Fellowships to cover some of the cost of participation in internships and fieldwork

Support for students engaging in internships and fieldwork at both the Master's and Doctoral levels will be provided through a fellowship system granting a maximum of 200,000 yen per student to cover up to one half of total expenses incurred for round trip, accommodations, and travel insurance.

Research Support Systems

A dedicated area for graduate students will be established within the LMS (Learning Management System), an online study and research support interface that can be accessed from both on and off campus.

We will develop this research environment to enable students to continuously keep track of their individual research activities on an ongoing basis, particularly those that form part of their Master's or Doctoral thesis.

Scholarship Amounts Available

- 1 International students granted a scholarship on a monthly basis in the Master's program may each receive 80,000 yen per month for two years.
A recipient in the Doctoral program may receive 100,000 yen per month for three years.
- 2 Those who selected the lump sum option may receive 300,000 yen per year.
- 3 When a foreign student is deterred from enrolling in the Osaka Jogakuin University Doctoral course for economic reasons due to the distinct difference in the cost of living between Japan and her home country, provided she fulfills the conditions of entry in terms of a research plan and the scholastic ability to carry it out to completion, the Doctoral course has a system whereby the entry fee is waived if the foreign student candidate serves as a Research and Teaching Assistant in support of Osaka Jogakuin undergraduates and Master's degree candidates.
